The most noticeable point about many of the season's large hats is the floral trimmings. A rose is often five or six times larger than the natural size, and in the bunches of grapes which adorn the newest hats each grape is about double the circumference of the ordinary fruit. But milliners force femininity to accept blossoms that would be classed as frenks in any flower show.

The afternoon frock illustrated suggests the shirt waist style, but is a bit less severe. It is of golden brown henrietta cloth, trimmed with braid and buttons to match the cloth.
